Editorial

Vale

During these cheery sunny days the student can with difficulty refrain from the pleasant life of out door games to occupy himself with his books which, at this time, must be pursued with even greater diligence than during the remainder of the school year. We, too, experience the same difficulty in discharging our duties towards Red and White, and, for this reason, feel a certain gladness in the thought that the last number of Volume XVII is practically ready for the press, and, that with it, our work is done. Nevertheless, we do not quit the magazine as something disagreeable, but as a friend we have learned to love, as something we began to look upon as our own and are loth to see passing to other hands.

During the course of our intimate connection with the College Magazine, we have experienced some difficulty, and found the work onerous at times, but never tiresome; for we had always the kind assistance of the Staff and the hearty co-operation of the students.

The high standard set by former Editors of greater ability was difficult to maintain, and, even though we may have sometimes fallen short, we did our best, and feel satisfied for having contributed at least a little towards keeping alive the traditions of our Alma Mater. As we vacate the editorial chair to make place for some one else we bear with us many pleasant memories, and extend kindest wishes for success to our successors and to RED AND WHITE.

Literary Medals

Last year the Red and White Staff deemed it advisable to offer prizes for the best literary contributions in order to stimulate interest in the magazine work and to obtain a greater variety of material to select from. This plan worked well and a marked improvement was noted in that volume, due to the fact that it was not necessary to publish all the contributions that were submitted. We, this year, have followed their example and are well pleased with the results.

Red and White can be successful only when each student looks upon it as his own and does all in his power to improve it. Although a good percentage of the students have written this year, there are still some with the mistaken idea that they cannot write anything and consequently do not try. We have no remedy to suggest for this, but if future managements can get all the students interested and writing they will have done a great deal for the magazine.

Four medals have been offered this year, besides these conferred on the senior members of the Red and White Staff.

According to the rules drawn up, members of the Staff cannot compete for these prizes.

The following students have won Literary Medals, this year:

A. A. Francis, for best Short Story—"A Rand is Ever Upright."

G. A. McDonald, for best poem—"Spring."

D. O. Leary, for best article—"Oil on Prince Edward Island."

John Johnston, for meritorious service.

We sincerely thank our advertisers, contributors, subscribers, and all who have in any way assisted us in publishing Volume XVII; we earnestly hope that they will show the same courtesy and consideration to our successor as they have to us.
